These sought to obligate China to make no loans without first consulting Japan and to employ no mean that Japan and Russia together tow seek to exploit the Chinese field by lending each other mutual support and mutually endeavoring to minimize the commercial influence of the United States.

The China loan policy was one of the first features of the foreign policy of the present Administration. It reversed the policy of the Tait Administration, which had asked American bankers to seek participation in the so-called five Power railway loan, the American share amounting to $125,000,000. The syndicate of American bankers consisted of J. P. Morgan & Co., the First National P. Morgan & Co., the First National Bank, the National City Bank and Kuhn, Deb & Co. The bankers were pisinly old that the United States Government would withdraw its support from par-ticipation in the loan. The President, backing up Secretary Bryan, said pubopprove the conditions of the loan or the

It is definitely known now that China is seeking to persuade the United States is seeking to persuade the United States Minister to support loans to her from American Lieut. Nicholas J. Egan of the Ninth bankers. The American State Department has been informed by China that financial aid from this country is its best chance for salvation.

However, the Administration's support has not been made clear or emphatic enough to encourage American hankers on a large scale, though the International Corporation has succeeded in reawakening financial interest in China and initiating a movement which may put American influence back where it was before Mr. Bryan interfered.

The status of the situation as explained to-day in State Department circles shows that the Russo-Japanese pack has quickened the interest of the Administration in the plight of American interests. The indefinite policy of support from the Administration has now practically changed to adefinite promise to encourage American enterprise and American loans.

It is explained authoritatively that the United States may reconsider under certain conditions the question of the grant of a shell.
